Reception The editors of PC Gamer in 2000 named StarCraft one of the greatest games ever made. Computer Gaming World in June 2000 stated that while StarCraft had succeeded commercially, it had fallen short in its innovation. In a review for a 2002 retrospective by IGN, the game was praised for its gameplay, humor, and soundtrack, as well as for being "better than the original." The editors of GameSpy ranked it the 49th greatest PC game of all time, and the editors of GameSpot named it the 22nd best PC game ever made. The editors of PC Gamer in 2003 named it the fifth best computer game ever released, the editors of GameSpot in 2004 named it the 37th best computer game of all time, and in 2005, PC Gamer US listed it as the 28th greatest game of all time. Legacy StarCraft spawned two sequels and four expansions, three of which were for the original game. The expansions introduced new units and campaigns and redefined the gameplay. The sequel, Brood War, was built around a new engine and featured new technology from Blizzard's Battle.net. It added a story mode and the "Aeon of Strife" campaign. It also introduced the new Terran homeworld of Aiur and other gameplay changes. The Brood War development team went on to create Diablo III, which was originally pitched as "a real-time strategy game set in the StarCraft universe" and was conceived during the Brood War development period. Some elements of Diablo III resemble the original StarCraft, such as healing, level caps, the ability to use a magic wand, and an alliance system. The Legacy of the Void expansion for StarCraft II features a new campaign featuring the Zerg. Legacy of the Void was the first 3D real-time strategy game developed by Blizzard Entertainment to be released for consoles.
